MUCH MYSTERY ABOUT MORALS REPORTS TO POLICE

The inspector of morals conditions in Chicago is Francis C. Hanna, a former newspaper man who has made good. Hanna took an examination to get the job. His office always seems to be busy. He has a corps of investigators always working. Numerous reports are made.

Reports are made and they are turned over to the chief of police. A Day Book reporter heard the reports were not acted upon, so he asked Chief Healey what he did with them.

Healey said he gave them to the captains of districts the reports referred to.

"Do you check up to see if the captains act on these reports?" the reporter asked.

"No," said the chief. "Why should I?"

"Do you keep any record of the reports in this office to enable you to see whether or not other reports come in about the same place?"

"No; why should I?"

The reporter had attempted to interview Hanna to find out how many reports of his are "forgotten" or "misaid" by the police department. Hanna said he couldn't talk without permission from his superior, Second Deputy Funkhouser.

So the reporter asked Major Funkhouser how many reports he had turned over to the chief in the last six months and in the six months previous to that time.

Funkhouser didn't know. He said the figures would be in the yearly report of his office, out in a month.

He refused the reporter permission to interview Hanna.

The reporter took his request to the chief of police. Healey said: "Go back to Funkhouser." Later Funkhouser said: "Go back to Healey."

So the reporter gave up.

He had failed to get the story, whether or not the police are really acting upon the information coming from the morals inspector's office.
